

WELCOME TO GET OUT THE HOUSE

12.10.25

I felt it would only be right for my first Side quest post to be a welcome to the Blog, which is essentially one big sidequest within itself. I have thoroughly enjoyed putting this site together aesthetically and content wise. I will not lie and say I enjoyed coding it lol, although I 100p learned a lot and I actually have come to enjoy coding when I have good music going and the code works within the first three attempts. Anyways, I am currently in Luxembourg playing Professional hoops, which has been a great experience, but has also left me with COPIOUS (I will be in my bag linguistically on this site) amounts of free time. Having all this time to myself has pushed me to learn more about myself and learn new things that I normally would not have time to learn. I felt like making a blog would be the perfect intersection of these 2 things, as in building this site I have learned a lot (mostly about patience and different ways to cuss out Chat GPT's clanker head ahh when it fucks up my code) and I now have a space where I'm able to kinda pour out the contents of my head / journey onto a platform. Real talk tho shoutout chat for all the help coding, I probably cut down a thousand trees worth with all my use of chat GPTs AI power but it is what it is the site is finished n here we are.

My cousin (shoutout Oskar) told me a Yung Lean quote once, and I don't remember it exactly, but it was basically about how when he makes music, he only makes it for himself. He said that if he ever felt like he was making music for anyone other than himself, he would stop because it would lose its purity and essence. I'm paraphrasing hella but you get the picture. This is the exact energy I want to keep with this blog. While I'm making it public (public may be a strong word as I HIGHLY doubt there are people that could be bothered to read all the shit that runs through my brain) I aim to keep the flow from brain to blog as untainted, pure, and authentic as possible (again vocab bag work fw me). Naturally, I am a bit embarrassed to be publishing thoughts that come to my brain so freely, but at the same time I think it is for the best and not to toot my own horn too much but also a bit admirable. I always have found that the people I find the coolest / the people I most want to be around are the people that are most authentically themselves. And if this BLOG is going to be anything, it is going to be authentically ME. Being authentically myself is the only way I am going to attract others with similar energy towards me, and suppressing my true being for the comfort / approval of others is not a lasting / authentic form of happiness. So here goes nothing.

In regards to the name of the site, the phrase “Get Out The House” came to me one day about a month back while I was journaling, and ever since that moment I knew I wanted to build something around this mantra and lifestyle. I say it is a lifestyle because that is genuinely how I try to live my life. Life begins the minute you step foot out the door and open yourself to the possibility and whims of the world. Here in Luxembourg especially, I have taken great care to spend most of my time out of my apartment and seeing /experiencing new things. Not in a “running from the voices in my head” way, but rather in a “grab life by the horns” and collect as many new and different life experiences as I can (verbal meme: Thanos getting the final stone for his gauntlet and powering up). If you have checked out the site for a minute, read this whole welcome post, or never even opened up the site at all, thank you and I am excited to get this digital time capsule / brain space / collage up and running. Lets work
